The invention relates to a method of storing and delivering (in a loop) a plurality of data streams into and out of a frame memory. A frame memory is a memory in which information can be stored, being accessible in the form of frames. FIG. 1 is a schematic drawing of a frame memory. In a data transmission operation, data is transmitted from a source to a destination, via a transmission link, and the data is written to the frame memory at the start of each frame. If the frames are written sequentially, the frame memory is a linear frame memory, in which the data in each new frame is written to the end of the previous frame. This is illustrated in FIG. 1. In the example shown in FIG. 1, the write address pointer is set to 1, in order to write data beginning in the frame of address 1. If the frame memory is part of the transmission link for each frame, then the actual transmission link may include a plurality of separate memory elements. If the frames are written sequentially, the frame memory is a linear frame memory. If the frames are written in a different order, e.g., in interleaved order, the frame memory is a non-linear frame memory. A buffer may be interposed between the source and the frame memory, in order to prevent a data overrun if the frames are written sequentially. If the frames are not written sequentially, the frame memory is a non-linear frame memory. In such a frame memory, the frame is written to an address that depends on the address of the last frame, as shown in FIG. 2. For example, the write address pointer may be set to 1, and the address of the first frame is 4, so the first frame of the frame memory is written to the address 3. This address 3 is the address of the last frame in the preceding frame. If the frames are written sequentially, the frame memory is a linear frame memory. If the frames are written in a different order, e.g., in interleaved order, the frame memory is a non-linear frame memory. If the frames are not written sequentially, the frame memory is a non-linear frame memory. In the circuit of FIG. 3, each frame memory 20, 22, 24 is connected to a transmission link 26 via a number of switch elements 31, 32, 33 and a buffer. A buffer 34 is connected between the source (not shown) and the frame memories 20, 22,
