It is found that the mean acceleration corresponding to a stationary observer is the velocity of the observer's origin. The same velocity is the mean acceleration of all points in a solid body moving with uniform velocity at constant acceleration. The variance of acceleration is a measure of the amount of vibration contained in acceleration. The variance is always positive. The same holds for accelerated observers at rest in a static gravitational field and at rest on a moving surface in a uniform gravity field. In a uniform gravitational field the acceleration of the mass, not of the observer, increases with distance. The present invention relates to a process for the recovery of a carbonaceous material from a carbonaceous material-containing ore such as coal mine spoil by the use of a leach solution and, more particularly, to a process for the recovery of a carbonaceous material from a carbonaceous material-containing ore by lixiviating the ore with a leach solution comprising a carbonic acid salt as a main component. The conventional method for recovering carbonaceous materials from carbonaceous material-containing ores is to use potassium cyanide (KCN) as a dissolving agent. However, in this method a large amount of waste is produced, and therefore the method is not suitable for industrial application. Therefore, studies have been conducted on using chloride ion, e.g., calcium chloride, as the dissolving agent. Chloride ion as the dissolving agent is preferred in view of cost because it has a lower price than potassium cyanide. However, when chloride ion is used as the dissolving agent, it is necessary to employ a high temperature in order to sufficiently disperse the calcium ion of the solution into the carbonaceous material-containing ore. Thus, this necessitates a high power consumption for industrial application. The present inventors have found a process for effectively recovering carbonaceous materials from carbonaceous material-containing ores and have filed applications on the same in Japanese Patent Application Nos. 49-99372 (application A) and 50-91324 (application
