He went on to claim that the group is also able to attract figures in the non-militant Muslim world, like the case of former al-Qaeda supremo Osama bin Laden who lived with the group in Afghanistan. Burglass also asserted that this is a result of their success in training young people in violence. "It is not only the gun training or the military training but it is also training the men in a different way. They do not learn how to cook well, but they learn their true mission," he said. His claims are firmly in line with years of US government and Israeli intelligence assessments that Hezbollah has become the most dangerous terrorist group in the world by the virtue of its ability to recruit and train young militants from across the globe, its ability to finance its violent activities through kidnapping, extortion and drug trafficking, and its ability to accurately plan and execute high-profile terrorist attacks. Al-Qaeda/ISIS Burglass, however, has a less flattering account of the Middle Eastern terrorist organisations. He acknowledged that "some al-Qaeda elements" have sprung up since the US-led invasion of Iraq, but denied that they had attained the stature of Hezbollah. "If you look at all the al-Qaeda today, then they

When I first booted up the Mac for the first time in over a month, I was surprised to see all of the new changes to Q. Why don't we move entities from componentWillUnmount() to an onWillUnmount() method? As the title suggests, I am wondering about why there aren't more methods in React that can be used to clean up state in React. I am thinking about componentWillUnmount() and shouldComponentUpdate() but what about onWillUnmount()? My thinking was that it might have been considered in the past that if we call setState() then the component will unmount anyway so then what is the point of this method? A: A componentWillUnmount gets called when the component is unmounting (either explicitly via a call to componentWillUnmount, or implicitly when the component is removed from a parent). You should call setState after onWillUnmount which makes the component unmount safe and ensures that when setState calls next time the component state is in consistent shape. shouldComponentUpdate too will call the next setState. This is just a move forward from componentWillReceiveProps/shouldComponentUpdate. Q: Changing Nominations for Moderator Election starts next week? It was almost a year ago, when I asked this question. I forgot to answer, because I was really busy for almost all the day, and I haven't had enough time to study the Nominations. Until today, when I saw that the new nominations will start next week. So, after this long time,
