Mortal Kombat Armageddon Download Free Ps2 Games! Product Key What kinds of tools can i use to determine whether a given wireless card has had its firmware hacked? I'm curious about whether there are any tools that can be used to identify firmware hacks on wireless adapters. In this particular instance, I'm thinking about some of the wireless USB adapters that seem to hang and fail to provide a DHCP address. Are there tools (both official and non-official) that will identify how a given wireless adapter has been modified? I would be interested to hear about any of these tools that were used to obtain the results. A: To answer this question requires knowledge of which information the manufacturer put into the firmware, as well as how it was extracted. It also requires some basic reverse engineering experience, as this level of information would be well beyond most people's abilities, even with a tool. A good introduction to reverse engineering and firmware can be found in The Art of Electronics (third edition), by Horowitz and Hill. It is a great book and very readable, which is also the reason I recommend it as a primer on this topic. As far as reverse engineering tools are concerned, there are a number of them. The simplest, and arguably the most robust of these is IDA. This is not actually "reverse engineering", but rather a disassembler. It allows you to examine the firmware and hopefully identify the flow of information. I've used it for a couple firmware dumps, and it was difficult, but not near impossible. Once you've figured out the data structures and the flow of the code, then it becomes trivial to figure out where the information goes. Stuff like this, however, requires considerable reverse engineering experience to understand and write a properly working disassembler. I've seen various systems for folks to do this, but there are many tutorials on the net that can guide you. To more directly address your question, the manufacturer of the firmware can put in pretty much any information they want. For wireless access points, the standard 0cc13bf012
